SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

Arthur Larson, legal scholar and speech writer, was born in South Dakota of Norwegian descent. He attended Augustana College in Sioux Falls, South Dakota, and received a Rhodes scholarship to Pembroke College at Oxford University. He worked as a practicing attorney for a few years in the 1930s, but eventually became a law professor and taught at various law schools from 1939 to 1954, except for a brief period of government service during World War II. His main field of interest was workmen's compensation law, and he compiled a major reference book on the subject which was published in 1952. This brought him to the attention of the U.S. Department of Labor. A friend from law school, John J. Gilhooley, was serving as an assistant to Secretary James Mitchell, and arranged to have Larson appointed Undersecretary of Labor in March 1954.

As undersecretary, Larson represented the Labor Department at cabinet meetings in the absence of the secretary. This brought him into frequent contact with President Eisenhower who was impressed by Larson's speechwriting ability and his internationalist philosophy. In late 1956, after the Suez and Hungarian crises, Eisenhower appointed Larson to head the U.S. Information Agency which was responsible for publicizing U.S. policies abroad.

In late 1957, after the Russians launched Sputnik, President Eisenhower transferred Larson to the White House to help write a series of speeches on science and national security policy. Larson's title was Special Assistant to the President. He became one of Eisenhower's main speech writers, and had a major role in developing the 1958 State of the Union message. He was also an avid internationalist and favored strengthening the United Nations and repealing the Connally Amendment which limited U.S. involvement in the World Court. Larson often tried to get Eisenhower to mention these topics in his speeches.

Larson's internationalist philosophy also led him to support international law and the adjudication of disputes between nations. In 1958 several lawyers connected with the American Bar Association proposed the development of a research center to study international law. Larson resigned from the White House staff in July 1958 to head the project, which eventually became the World Rule of Law Research Center at Duke University in Durham, North Carolina. Larson served as director of the Center until his retirement in 1980. However, he also remained in close contact with Eisenhower. He served as Special Consultant to the President from 1958 to 1961 and assisted with some of Eisenhower's speeches during this period. In the late 1960s he wrote a book entitled Eisenhower: The President Nobody Knew, which described Eisenhower as an activist president who was firmly in control of his administration.

The papers of Arthur Larson are a fragmentary collection pertaining primarily to his relationship with President Eisenhower and his service as director of the Rule of Law Center. Most other areas of Larson's career are poorly documented. The collection is divided into four series. The first series contains drafts of speeches which Larson helped prepare for Eisenhower. Many of the drafts bear handwritten notations by Eisenhower and show the care with which he followed the evolution of the text.

The second series consists of copies of speeches, articles and research reports compiled by Larson and the staff of the Rule of Law Center. The material was originally filed in a set of binders in roughly chronological order. The documents during the early and mid-1960s cover a wide range of topics on international law, such as the role of the United Nations and the World Court, the adjudication of international disputes, the codification of international law, and legal practices in underdeveloped countries and non-Western cultures, particularly Hindu and Islamic law. From the late 1960s onward the material pertains mostly to Larson's continuing interest in workmen's compensation law in the U.S.

The third series consists of information on Larson's writings. Larson wrote extensively on legal matters and political philosophy but only a small portion of his writings are represented in this series. Apart from a few of his speeches and articles, most of the material pertains to his book on Dwight D. Eisenhower and his memoirs. Larson's memoirs consist of drafts of several chapters on his early life and legal career. This is the only material in the collection on his career before the Eisenhower administration, except for a scrapbook which he kept at Pembroke College in England in the early 1930s. The series also contains the final version of Larson's memoirs as completed by his son Lex Larson after his father's death in 1993.

Larson's book, Eisenhower: The President Nobody Knew, which was published in 1968, was drawn primarily from Larson's personal observations of Eisenhower. Larson had a habit of carrying small notebooks with him in which he recorded jokes and bon mots which came to his attention, notes for articles or speeches on which he was working at the time, and notes on his meetings with important people. These original notebooks are in the Subject Series. However, while working on his Eisenhower book, Larson had his staff go through the notebooks and transcribe all the entries relating to his meetings with Eisenhower and the White House staff. Larson then cut the transcripts into small pieces, usually individual paragraphs, and arranged the pieces by subject matter, apparently as a way of helping to organize his thoughts. The files on the Eisenhower book contain these pieces, arranged by the chapters or subjects to which they pertain. The files also contain a few drafts of portions of the book, although the drafts are fragmentary and incomplete.

The fourth series is a subject file, containing Larson's scrapbooks, notebooks, and a small quantity of correspondence. Of particular importance are Larson's memorandum books which cover his work during the Eisenhower administration. To assist researchers in using the memorandum books, the Eisenhower Library staff made electrostatic copies of the pieces of the transcripts in the Writings Series. The copies were then reassembled in their original order and filed with the books containing the original handwritten entries. While comparing the transcripts with the notebooks it was found that Larson's staff had trouble reading his handwriting. Many transcripts have dashes which indicate illegible words in the notebooks. In a few cases the staff mis-read his entry and used different words than what appear in the notebooks. Researchers are urged to always compare the transcripts with the notebooks in order to determine the correct wording of any passages of interest.

The correspondence in the Subject Series pertains mostly to Dwight D. Eisenhower and George Romney. The Eisenhower correspondence covers the period after Larson left the White House and shows his continuing contacts with the President. The Romney correspondence is from 1967 and shows Larson's efforts to have Romney make a major speech on Vietnam in preparation for the 1968 presidential campaign.

The scrapbooks in the Subject Series mostly cover the period from 1954 to 1971 and consist of news clippings and other publicity material pertaining to Larson's government career and his work at the Rule of Law Center. Of particular importance is an early scrapbook covering his student days at Pembroke College in England from 1932 to 1935.
